In addition to personal identification, financial documents are a prerequisite for every financial transaction. Financial forms are the first thing needed when applying for a mortgage, a loan, or any kind of membership. Whether an individual is buying a house, paying taxes or paying an insurance premium, the need of a financial form is obligatory to avoid discrepancies in the future. Other reasons cited for keeping financial documents include:

- Dispute Resolution
- Proof of Authenticity
- Proof of payment and other transactions

Many documents, including bank and brokerage firm statements, are now available in electronic form and are often accessible on bank and brokerage firm sites for years. Still, most experts recommend not relying on banks or brokerage firms to keep this documentation because they may fail or charge to retrieve copies of older documents. For tax purposes, the I.R.S. generally requires records in paper form so tax experts recommend individuals have a system for storing their paper documents.
